

Readings Presentation & Critical Questions

engl 242 / sec. E / winter quarter 2007-08 / chang

Our class covers a broad survey of literatures of the fantastic, from Homer to Harry Potter. One of the best ways to explore and understand a text is through close reading. Another way to explore and understand a text, using what you have gained through reading, is through lively discussion and questioning both the text and your experience of it. Part of your overall class participation grade will be based on an oral readings presentation. You will be required to sign-up at least once during the quarter, to read the texts assigned for that particular day, to generate a critical question, and to get class discussion started. You do not need to turn anything written in for the presentation (though a brief handout is always appreciated). Readings presentations should be 3 to 5 minutes.

What is a Critical Question?

Generating critical questions is a necessary and useful academic skill; critical questions are often the beginning of intellectual or theoretical or artistic exploration, require active and attentive reading and thinking, and can generate the beginnings of analysis, multiple perspectives on an issue, topics for research, ways to critique and understand a text, and further curiosity for the material at hand.

Your critical question for your readings presentation should develop from a close reading of one of the week's texts and your critical thinking about the text. What questions or concerns do you want to ask of the text? What questions or concerns does the text ask of you? Your critical question should be developed, dimensional, and complex that pushes beyond simple questions of theme, symbolism, personal opinion, or personal reaction. Consider the following when generating your critical question; your critical question:

–May focus on one passage or one main idea of the text. How does the passage fit the overall text? How does the main idea run through the whole text? What makes the passage or idea important? What connections does it make to other texts, to the course goals?

–May think about the larger critical questions of our class, beyond just the course goals. What does the text reveal about our “culture”? How and why and what does the text respond to, reassert, or critique keywords like race, gender, class, sexuality, nation, and citizenship.

–Asks more than, “What does _____ mean?” Critiques more than just theme, symbol, character, plot, setting. Think about the following: What is important about _____? Does _____ raise questions about representation (or how the text makes meaning), how we understand our lives and our world? Does _____ challenge or perpetuate cultural definitions, norms, traditions, ideologies?

–Begins with “How might...” or “Why...” and requires answers beyond yes or no, right or wrong, black or white. How and why and what would your answer to such a question be? In fact, critical questions often invite many different ways to answer a question and different kinds of evidence and reasoning as well.

–May be explicitly about the form, structure, language, and rhetorical or literary features of the text. What is its genre (short story, poem, essay, novel, play)? How and why and what does it play with form? What rhetorical or literary features does it possess? How and why and what does it play with these features? How is the text answering the question, “What is literature?”

–Contextualizes the text in history, geography, politics, academia, and its conditions and modes of production. In other words, how and why and what is important about when the text was made, who the text was made for, where it was made, how it was made, and why it was made? What does its context tell us about our own context as we read it now?
